The bereavement process

With the winter holidays approaching, we'll soon be hearing festive music, seeing colorful light displays and sensing commotion all around us. The whole world seems consumed with the holiday spirit, but those who are grieving are only aware of the terrible hole in their lives. Grieving persons do not function within the norm.

Priorities must be reevaluated and decisions made about what is really meaningful for you and your family. Here are some ideas other bereaved persons have shared. Remember there is no right or wrong way to grieve, nor a prescribed timetable.

Decide what is in your emotional and physical budget to handle. Make decisions about planning that will be meaningful for you, as well as, for your family. Be mindful that family gatherings may be difficult. Adjust your expectation of self, family and what you are capable of. Be careful of "shoulds", as holidays can be physically and emotionally draining. You need every bit of fuel for the journey so take time to rest. What you do this year does not have to become tradition. You can do it completely different next year. Make efforts to engage in activities that hold the most meaning for you.

What is needed during times of grieving:

Caring: Try to allow yourself to accept the expression of caring from others even though they may be uneasy and awkward. Helping a friend or relative who is also suffering the same loss may bring a feeling of comfort.

Small pleasures: Do not underestimate the healing effects of small pleasures. Sunsets, crunching through the snow in the woods, blowing some bubbles, sampling your favorite food. These are all small steps toward regaining your pleasure in life itself.

Small goals: Make small goals as a means to have something to look forward to. Schedule dinner with a friend, plan a long weekend trip, volunteer at an animal shelter, go to the gym or take a class on Zoom. Living one day at a time is the rule of thumb. At first, do not be surprised if your level of enjoyment is not the same. This is normal. As time passes, you will ready yourself to make longer term goals which will provide structure and direction to your life.

Permission to have a "Griefburst": Often times, after a period of going along on a level plane a wave of emotion is triggered by an interaction with one of your five senses. You may experience sadness, despair or even anger all over again. This is the nature of grief, it's personal and often times it arises when you least expect it. It is likened to a rolling wave that comes and goes. The hope is that as you grow through your "griefbursts", they become less frequent or intense, and may eventually blossom into a "pop-up", where happy memories are reclaimed. It is important to pace yourself through pain of loss and find acceptance over time.

The griever's holiday bill of rights

1. You have the right to say "time out" anytime you need to do so.

Take a time out to blow off steam, step-away from the holiday bustle, huddle up, and start over.

2. You have the right to tell it like it is.

When people ask, "How are you?" You have to tell them how you really feel, not just what they want to hear.

3. You have the right to do things differently.

There is no law that says you must always do Christmas (or other holidays the same way). You can do 10 cards instead of 100. You can do no cards at all! You can open presents at somebody else's house. You can do without a tree. You can have pizza instead of turkey. The list is endless.

4. You have the right to be where you want to be.

Be at home, with friends or relatives. Be in any city or state you choose. There is no law that says you must stay at home, but be careful, be safe and be responsible.

5. You have the right to some fun.

When you have a day that isn't so bad and you feel like doing something fun, do it. Don't be afraid of what someone else will say if they see you laughing and having a good time. Laughter is every bit as important as tears. As hard as it to believe, you will laugh again.

6. You have the right to change directions mid-stream.

Holiday grief is unpredictable. You may be all ready to go somewhere or to do something and suddenly be overwhelmed. When this happens, it's OK to change your mind. There will be plenty of time in life to be predictable. Exercise your right to change your mind.

7. You have the right to do things at different times.

Go to church at a different time. Open presents at a different time. Serve your Holiday meal at a different time. Go to bed and get up at a different time. Don't be a slave to the holiday clock. You may even choose to celebrate on a different day.

8. You have a right to rest, peace and solitude.

You don't have to be busy all the time. Take a nap whenever you need one. Take time to pray and/or meditate, recharge your spirit.

9. You have a right to do it all differently next year.

Just because you change things one year, doing something different does not mean you have written it in stone. Next year you may want to change it back or still do things another new way.

Grief at Thanksgiving: Gratitude with a grain of salt

Summary of article taken from What's Your Grief. Org

Acknowledge the giant turkey in the room. Thanksgiving can be a bad time for people who are grieving.

Many values, traditions, and messages associated with the day, like warmth, comfort, gratitude, and family togetherness, can feel like a direct conflict with the grieving person's actual reality. Although you may be hesitant to admit it in the face of all the festivities, the "30-days of "Thankfulness" challenge on Facebook and Charlie Brown and his dang pumpkin, may make you feel left out and less grateful than you have in years past.

After a death, it's common for grieving people to feel apathy towards the experiences and activities that use to bring them joy. This is not a deliberate choice anyone makes, grief just changes the way life looks and feels. Sadly, this loss of joy may seem like a secondary loss, especially if you fell out of touch with things you previously cherished, like holidays and special days. You long for the familiar enthusiasm for holiday cheer, but instead you feel like you are standing out in the cold, watching through a window while everyone else experiences the warmth and togetherness of the season.

Many people feel like the holidays are only for happy people and so the sad need to shape up or ship out.

Your invitation to the holidays isn't simply revoked because you don't embody holiday cheer. Some of you may be thinking about scrapping Thanksgiving altogether. You may be dreading sights, smells, and sounds that trigger your grief. Your loved one may have been central to the day and you may feel you cannot carry it off without him or her, or maybe you are just feeling anything but grateful. Rethink this mindset! Remember, holidays aren't just for happy people, neither is gratitude. You don't have to choose between grief and feeling grateful. You can experience two feelings at once. Grief is fertile ground for experiencing conflicting emotions. Try to have a balanced outlook toward gratitude this Thanksgiving.

People with negative outlook may be more likely to find depressing, cynical, and suspicious explanations for events. They may feel their lives are globally awful, they themselves are globally awful, and believe these realities will never change.

Gratitude has been shown to help. According to a study by McCullough and Emmons in 2003, taking time to journal five things you are grateful for one time a week for nine weeks will increase your well-being, strides for better health, (including exercise), and increase your optimism. Even though Thanksgiving will feel different this year, actively seeking gratitude can be empowering to reclaim a part of the holiday for yourself.

Finding gratitude is simple. Pay attention to your thoughts and when you catch yourself feeling negative and pessimistic, think to yourself, "Yes, AND I also have _____ to be grateful for." Be grateful for something; hot cup of coffee, a happy memory, a song you like, your dog or cat, or that green bean casserole—KIS (keep it simple!). If not every day at least make it through Thanksgiving dinner. You don't want to be caught off guard when the Thanksgiving yahoo suggests everyone share one thing they are grateful for at the Thanksgiving dinner table!

Two Part Mindset:

Part One: Remember, it's okay to feel ungrateful

You're a person who has had a difficult year. It's okay to acknowledge this and to recognize your grief, apathy, and sadness. You don't need to stuff your feelings for the benefit of other people. You are not responsible for any other adult's happiness. There will be times when you put on a front, like at work or child-related celebrations, and that's okay. But the bottom-line: It's okay to acknowledge all the reasons why you are anything but grateful.

Part Two: For every gripe, find a gratitude

Acknowledging your gratitude doesn't minimize or erase the difficult thoughts, memories, and emotions you are experiencing. It may simply help balance your outlook a little. Balancing your outlook is important because grief can make people feel cheated, angry, self-focused, bitter, lonely, isolated, resentful, guilty, sad, anxious, worried, or depressed. Over time, negativity can have a large impact on their overall worldview.

Thanksgiving thoughts

by Kathleen Barletta, LMSW, ACSW

When one is grieving it can be difficult to focus on what we are grateful for. During this Thanksgiving first and foremost, be kind to yourself. This is a very different time in your life. Set realistic expectations, don't think too "big", think on a smaller scale. Hopefully, this will help decrease feelings of being overwhelmed. Have a plan, tell people what you need, and what would be most helpful to you. If you don't want to participate in Thanksgiving that's okay too; you know yourself best. Remember this about you and your healing process. It is also okay to celebrate Thanksgiving. It is okay to be sad and miss your loved one; and even shed some tears. If you can be with friends and loved ones it is helpful to share the memories and laughter of your loved one too. Being with people who care about you helps in the healing process. Wishing you peace and comfort this Thanksgiving season.

Sending you a big hug,

Kathleen
